A-rated classical is what I'm usually hooked into. But lately, I've been browsing the free to use plugin sites looking for samples and came across Beethoven's Triple Concerto in F major (French: Troisième concerto en sol mineur à trio avec violon et basso continuo). I've had this album in my collection for many years, and I've had a copy of it on my computer since I was ten. I've always been partial to the full orchestration of it, but often when I listen to it I realize I could really use a choir of some sort to give it that big, bassy, rockin' feel. So I went into my SynthWays Library and searched for choir products. After some searching, I found a real gem in the form of Anthem Choir, a free non-linear and legato choir. The number of available items in the library is constantly growing, and I'm finding a lot of new, incredible samples in the public domain. I would suggest checking out Anthem's library at Feeling a little lost: multiple instruments needed (that actually play together?) A: Unless your a virtuoso organist who can perform that trumpet like he's fingering it himself, you're probably better off with a separate brass instrument. You might be better served by looking at a Kong catalog or just browsing through one of the Brass resources people have mentioned, such as Wessy (who needs all of the above in their catalog and more) or this brass.org website that has tons of instruments and libraries to choose from. Kong has a lot of inexpensive cataloged instruments from the largest companies in the business, and Wessy has instruments from a small "home studio" that do not cost that much and tend to be a lot of fun to play. Both have descriptions and videos so you can see if they're of the style you want. More than 3da54e8ca3
