The present invention relates to the combination of chemotherapy with other treatment techniques such as hyperthermia. In radiation therapy, the goal is to deliver a predetermined, precise dose of ionizing radiation to a targeted anatomical location. Recently, imaging techniques such as CT have improved the ability of the physician to identify the exact location of the tumor. By means of a linear accelerator (LINAC) or a dedicated hyperthermia system, the radiation oncologist directs the radiation beam from the LINAC towards the patient's tumor. The dose at the tumor is determined based on a pre-operative imaging scan and physical measurements, which ensures a precisely targeted dose of radiation. A wide variety of tumor-localizing agents have been developed to better target the radiation delivery system to the tumor. One class of such tumor-localizing agents include radionuclides and/or chemical compounds which accumulate preferentially in solid tumors. As these tumor-localizing agents may interfere with the effectiveness of chemotherapy, they are not typically used in combination with chemotherapy. Within the last decade, Hyperthermia treatment has proven to be a very effective method for the control of certain forms of cancer, either alone, or as a combination therapy with other forms of treatment such as radiation, chemotherapy or surgery. Hyperthermia refers to raising the temperature of a tumor above about 42 degrees C., and generally 100-110 degrees F. has been the accepted upper limit for cancer treatment. Hyperthermia raises the temperature of tumor cells because of various heat shock proteins that are present in the tumor but not in most normal tissues. Therefore, hyperthermia may be used to selectively kill tumor cells because tumor cells have a relatively high expression level of heat shock proteins. In contrast, normal, healthy cells possess a lower level of heat shock proteins and as a result, are less affected by hyperthermia. Therefore, where possible, hyperther e79caf774b
