Q: Do all the cases in bash's String comparison not use ==? I know that the other testing operators work the same way, for example == and != will all the cases test the equality in one case and non-equality in the other. For instance, $ str1="this is a string" $ str2="this is another string" $ str3="this is another string with spaces" $ echo "$str1 == $str2" true $ echo "$str1 == $str3" false $ echo "$str2 == $str3" true But for the case in bash, I tested and the result is $ echo $str1 == $str3 0 $ echo $str1 == $str2 false Are all the cases done with equality testing in bash or some cases are mixed in with non-equality? A: The equality comparison operators are for comparing string values. The single == will compare the strings value as strings, and the = will test equality as numbers. The answer to your question is that = is used for comparison in all cases, except that some string comparison operators don't return a result based on comparing two strings as numbers. For instance: $ echo "abcd" == "abcd" 0 When you run echo "$str1 == $str2", the output is
