Prosecutors are appealing against the acquittal of a German police officer who was charged with sexual assault of a minor on the grounds he was unfairly identified from a mugshot. Rolf Hoffmann was arrested in May 2013 after a family friend in his native Germany called police with concerns that Rolf "may have committed a crime". He was acquitted of sexual assault and another crime, after the judge found he was wrongly identified because of a facial injury sustained during a struggle. The presiding judge, Johannes Noll, ruled the expert police witness who testified had been wrong to claim Hoffmann had not been hit during the struggle. All of the charges against Hoffmann were dropped. "As the judge recognised, the identification of Hoffmann after the violent encounter was possibly the result of a misidentification, since the identification of the suspect is essential to convict him," said a statement from prosecutors. "[The prosecution] is not able to verify Hoffmann's assumed injuries." The state attorney general's
