There is no doubt that competition in the pharmaceutical market in recent years has led to the emergence of generic pharmaceutical products. Many pharmaceuticals are already available in generic form, but so far few truly competitively priced generic drug products exist in the marketplace. There has been considerable interest among consumers in the development of effective and safe, alternative treatments for conditions that are responsive to or proven to be susceptible to treatment with particular drug products or that are susceptible to chronic conditions that are responsive to or proven to be susceptible to treatment by drugs of limited effectiveness. Most of the non-proprietary drugs currently available in the marketplace are subject to substantial regulatory constraints regarding dosage, administration, efficacy, and/or side-effects, and it is this regulatory framework that inhibits the development of truly effective and safe alternative drug products in the marketplace. Additionally, other criteria that would be desirable to define for new non-proprietary drug products, e.g., target disease, drug class, drug route of administration, as well as patient characteristics can be limiting factors in the approval and use of non-proprietary drug products. Regardless of whether a patient is treated with a non-proprietary drug product or is instead treated with an established pharmaceutical product, a major concern that a patient has is to avoid adverse drug events that can damage the patient's health. It is for this reason that some patients will not take their medications at all or have great difficulty taking their medications as prescribed. In addition, some patients may have a predisposition to adverse drug events, for example, by having an allergic reaction to or developing an incompatibility with one or more active ingredients in the drug product. Improvements in non-proprietary drug products is needed, in that the patient's ability to respond effectively to such drug products is still limited because the pharmacological and clinical profile of such drug products is often modified by the active or inactive ingredients. In many instances, alternative and/or complementary treatment(s) to non-proprietary drug products is/are needed for the patient to receive the maximum benefit from the non-proprietary drug product. Such alternatives can include either supplying an oral dose or 6d1f23a050
