Staphylococci were isolated from the nasal and ocular cavities of stray dogs and cats in five different locations in Kuwait City. Eleven isolates were tested for virulence with the Galleria mellonella larva assay and 20 isolates were tested for in vitro resistance to antibiotic agents by the agar dilution technique. The isolates were examined by Gram stain and by the latex agglutination test for their coagulase activity. The coagulase-positive staphylococci (CPS) constituted 93.1% of all staphylococci isolated from both dogs and cats. Of the CPS, 71.4% were staphylococci in species that also possessed coagulase in other species of veterinary importance. The most common CPS in both animals and humans were Staphylococcus intermedius and Staphylococcus aureus. Of the CPS that inhibited growth of horse blood with a final absorbance of less than 1.0, 90% were identified as staphylococci in species that also possessed coagulase in other species of veterinary importance. Fifty-five percent of CPS that inhibited growth of horse blood with a final absorbance of 1.0-2.0 were identified as coagulase-negative staphylococci (CNS). Both CPS and CNS isolated from cats showed a higher overall sensitivity to antimicrobial agents than those isolated from dogs. Of the test drugs tested, penicillin G appeared to be the most effective antimicrobial agent for both species of animals. Staphylococci isolated from dogs and cats appeared to have similar resistance patterns for antimicrobial agents.
