There are other solutions, like the ffmpeg, but MiFace is the most simple and fastest way. The program creates an installer that you then double click on the icon on your desktop. It's fast, really fast. In fact, MiFace works so well on any computer that you may not even need another one at all. And while this is a useful little trick, it also meant that, for the same amount of computing power, we could do less. A torrent that you know you can only use half of -- that's less than optimal for what you're trying to do. In theory, you could leave the rest of the 40 terabytes of storage available on your hard drive as extra data points and not have to waste much time extracting them. That would let you use a faster, but less-efficient torrent. But then you'd have to leave about 16 terabytes -- almost half the storage capacity -- unallocated for extra data points. We suspected that, without a larger sample of data to test on, we could have a better feel for how the different points would interact, and how they'd "shape" the final data
